Thursday, 30 May, 2013

Sovereign Hill CEO, Jeremy Johnson, today announced that Brett Dunlop has been appointed to the position of Museums Director, replacing Tim Sullivan, who has moved to take up a senior management role at the Australian War Memorial.

“Brett will bring a wealth of museum experience to Sovereign Hill from his current role as Manager Melbourne Museum which he has held for the past decade,” Mr Johnson said.

“The new Melbourne Museum has developed an enviable reputation as one of the world’s great museums and a world-class cultural tourism experience and Brett has contributed a key role in its success,” he stated.

The role of Museums Director at Sovereign Hill will see Mr Dunlop take on responsibility for managing Sovereign Hill’s extensive collections, research, publications, public programs, educational services, museum interpretation and volunteers. The environmental education program at “Narmbool”, Elaine, also falls within his portfolio.

Mr Dunlop said he was delighted to be joining Sovereign Hill at such a significant time as it moves to strengthen its research and interpretation work using the new facilities available at the Gold Museum Collections and Research Centre and to support the new National Education Curriculum for schools.

Mr Dunlop will officially commence duties on 15 July, 2013.
